 Yes the interim plan should focus on the unregulated systems. I agree with the mix of environmental outcomes. I believe the measures on face value do address environmental needs and the needs of other water users. Like any plan it will no doubt need revisiting after different dry and wet events to see how the plans have impacted on all those involved. Main issue is education and communication with all involved. I think the measures proposed are a good start. The most likely impact is economic as the plan will most likely reduce the opportunity to pump in the unregulated system. But in the interest of long term sustainability these measures are imperative. One aspect that isn't talked about any where is sustainability of the whole system including irrigation methods. I don't believe water use can be looked at in isolation when poor land management practices can also contribute to water quality and quantity issues. Trialing measures in the priority areas is a useful approach.
